Let us sing of the men and women who have cherished their hearths and gardens on this earth, our homestead,
For they have turned the forests and the wilderness into farms and villages and cities. Their comings and goings have worn paths across the world and made friendly ways for our feet.
They have plied the roads and the seas, and taught us to escape the reefs and the weather. No longer need we wander, to gather nuts and berries, to find roots and apples.
No longer do we lie cold and hungry to trap the wandering hare and antelope. No longer do we huddle in thickets and crouch in caves to escape the wind and sleet. Jungles that our cities are, they are mild and fraternal places when seen against the jungles that our fathers and mothers roamed for a million years, before they learned to plant corn and build villages.
It is easy to give thanks to one God, to imagine his single presence, to speak to his one ear. It is not so easy to give thanks to five hundred generations of our ancestors, from whom we have received our customs and our arts, our laws, and our learning and our civility. Yet they are to us the givers of the goods of our common life.
Our gratitude will be known as we become one with them, and in our turn leave benefits to five hundred generations that follow us, to generations beyond end if man can make his peace with himself and establish his security in the universe.

We arrive out of many singular rooms, walking over the branching streets We come to be assured that our brothers and sisters surround
us The warmth of their hands assures us,
and the gladness of our spoken names This is the reason of cities, of homes, of assemblies
in the houses of fellowship.
